Dear Dr. Vaughan-McGovern,

I am writing to provide confirmation that EDF 2005: Introduction to the Teaching Profession meets the objectives for designation as a Writing Across the Curriculum (WAC) course at Florida Atlantic University.

EDF 2005 is designed to foster student engagement with writing as an integral part of learning and professional development. The course requires students to produce both preparatory and finished writing across multiple assignments, including:

1. Autobiography (Two-Part Assignment): Students draft and revise a personal learning narrative (2–3 pages, then 5–6 pages) connecting life experiences with educational theory, emphasizing reflective and analytical writing.
2. School Journal Assignment: Students complete four separate two-page journal entries based on real classroom observations, integrating insights from course readings and discussions.
3. Reimagining Your Classroom Final Paper: Students produce a three-page argumentative essay with a required outline and multiple sources, demonstrating synthesis of learning theories and professional insights.

Throughout the course, students engage in recursive writing processes, including drafting, global and local revision, and incorporation of instructor feedback. Assignments require critical thinking, integration of readings, and discipline-specific writing conventions with proper citation formats, all of which align with WAC outcomes.

Sincerely,

Sipai Klein
